

Brown Mouse (Amazon)

Overall, I thought the Amazon Basics was my favorite mouse, despite probably being the cheapest on the list. I didn't have much support for my left pal (left F1/F2 and F3), which as I'll mention later, I think I actually like, especially after I went back and tested my own mouse and noticed I mostly use the right side of my hand a lot. However, the mouse had a lot of support for my thumb, letting me rest the tip of my thumb (E1) comfortably on the side of the mouse. There wasn't too much pinky support, which is evident by the lack of prints in D2 and D3, but it was still better than others, like the Apple mouse that, while there was room for my pinky, still felt uncomfortable. I liked not having too much of my finger on the mouse as well, so I could just use the tips of my fingers (A1/B1/C1) for clicking.

Green Mouse (Apple)

Overall, I rated the Apple mouse as second. The height annoyed me a little, as I prefer a mouse with less slope/incline. However, I thought the grip was really good, and all three of my middle fingers fit really well, despite not having much contact in the A2/A3 areas. I think this showed me that I don't use a lot of my pointer finger on the mouse, and I really just use the tip, as is evident from the previous example as well. Furthermore, even though the height/curvature was a little annoying, it wasn't too bad, and I didn't end up having too much of my palm on the mouse, something I prefer. I like having a mouse with a bit of room for the left side of my palm (the left of F1/F2 and F3), but more support on the right (F4 and above).

Yellow Mouse (Windows)

Overall, I rated the Windows mouse as my third favorite. I found the mouse a bit bulky. I had the most hand coverage with this mouse, with every area but F3 seeming to be covered or having a majority contact. However, I personally didn't like the full coverage, and felt I had a little too much contact with mouse. It felt a little narrow, so I didn't have a great grip for my index finger, and my pinkie finger and thumb both felt awkward on the mouse due to a lack of grooves or support for them, although as I did note in my general, there was ok support for the thumb, especially when compared to the right side. Not as bad as some other mice, but definitely not the best, and it showed me I don't like a "full hand" mouse.

Pink Mouse (Lenovo)

Overall, I rated the Lenovo mouse as the worst mouse overall. I found the mouse extremely narrow, and I had trouble fitting even my ring finger onto the top of the mouse. As is evident by the hand print, I had almost no contact in the C/D areas, save extremely small markings in C1 and D1/D2. I also found I got more palm space on this mouse, which is something I don't actually prefer. I personally thought the mouse was a little too tall, which I believe led to the palm issue and it just felt uncomfortable to use with the large arch in my hand.
